Author: Saylor Foundation

The Constitution divides the foreign policy powers between the president and Congress, but not in a definitive manner. Why is this?

Please choose only one answer:

- Making foreign policy is a prolonged process involving many actors comprising dozens of individual policies toward different countries and regions.
- The roles and relative influence of the two branches in making foreign policy rarely differ from each other.
- There is usually unanimous consent between the president and Congress when faced with a foreign threat.
- Congress has historically deferred to the president's dominance through the War Powers Act.
- Congress usually approves legislative funding for foreign conflicts that concern troop involvement.
